

Shannon Gough is a human rights professional with several years experience in the area of business and human rights. She is an associate with the Business and Human Rights Project at the ABA's Center for Human Rights, where she is involved in several collaborative initiatives to promote business and human rights in the legal field.

She has previously worked on Investor State Dispute Settlement, contributed to research used to advise the UK's Foreign and Commonwealth Office on their policy on multinationals and human rights and worked as an analyst with the Conflict Risk Network, where she was responsible for producing the Sudan Company Report, a for-cost publication relied upon by hundreds of institutional investors and government organizations in the US and abroad and engaged with companies to assist them in improving their human rights practices on the ground.

Shannon has an MA in Criminology from the University of Melbourne and an LLM in International Human Rights Law with distinction from the University of Essex.